Treatment you can live with.

Mike Baiker was about to become a father; again. With three kids of his own, and a fiancée with three kids, his diagnosis of cancer in both kidneys was devastating, suggesting a gloomy prospect of lifelong dialysis. But Ingalls pegged Mike as a perfect candidate for cryoablation, an advanced technique that targets and freezes just the tumor while sparing his kidneys. Mike went home the next day with his kidneys intact, and after a second procedure, a CT scan showed no evidence of cancer. Today, Mike has returned to saving other people's lives as a busy EMT.

Ingalls is a place that helps its patients survive the kind of cancer that matters most...yours.

New treatments create hope for the future, now.

When Avery Richardson first learned his colorectal cancer had spread to his liver, he feared the worst. But thanks to an innovative new procedure available at Ingalls, he is enjoying life with his new bride, Regina Hendon. Ingalls doctors used a sophisticated Interventional Radiology procedure to effectively treat Avery's condition, without surgery, while sparing his healthy liver tissue. Radioactive microspheres, inserted into the microscopic blood vessels that fed his tumors, provided effective management of Avery's cancer. Ingalls offers real hope to treat the one kind of cancer that matters most...yours.

Care that gives you a second chance.

Harry Preston is one of a kind. A retired hospital administrator and frequent traveler, his life was briefly interrupted by a routine gallbladder surgery. After surgery, his attentive Ingalls surgeon expressed concern over his labored breathing and, instead of releasing him, ordered a CT scan. The scan revealed a massive tumor on his lung. After surgery and chemotherapy, Harry was happy to learn his body had responded well and additional treatments would be unnecessary. Today, Mr. Preston remains cancer-free.

Patients are indebted to Ingalls for being the kind of hospital that takes a second look at the one kind of cancer that matters...yours.
